Summary:

Paul Thorne is no angel. A hard man with a troubled past, his mistake was to fall for the wrong girl. When he said yes to love, he opened the door to death.

A tragic accident finds him running for his life from a vicious London crime boss. He seeks sanctuary in a sleepy, Welsh seaside town but instead of solace, he finds jealousy and betrayal.

A brutal journey through the underbelly of 80s and 90s Britain. Violent and sad. Powerful, beautiful prose lingers like a bruise, haunting the mind, long after the last page is read.

Tell us a little about The Welsh Man...

It's both a road trip and an old-fashioned love story, set in 80's and 90's Britain. Our Welsh hero has had a tough upbringing and ends up working for a crime boss in London. A tragic accident changes everything, and he ends up on the run from gangsters. It's quite a gritty read but very real. I like to think there is kindness, decency and hope there too.

Where do you draw writing inspiration from?

Real life. A lot of my poetry is about me or the people and places I know. My 'Hagar' crime thriller trilogy is set in and around areas I'm comfortable with or know something about and neatly slots into the 'Cymru noir' genre.

As for why I write, I don't really know, I suppose it's a bit like the 'Ancient Mariner' who is compelled to tell his tale to gain a sort of catharsis!

What book is currently on your bedside table?

I always have a few books on the go. I've just finished The Bayou Trilogy by Daniel Woodrell – boy can this author write! I've also recently read The Forever War by Joe Haldeman which moved me to tears and Hunger by Knut Hamsen – wow, loved it. As for favourite authors, I love Frederick Forsyth, Wilbur Smith and Cormac McCarthy. Poets – there are too many incredible names out there, but I'm a big fan of Gary Snyder, Charles Bukowski, Anne Sexton and Brian Patten.
